EPA Chief Promises 'Clear Road Map' on

Air Pollution Rules for Utilities

By ROBIN BRAVENDER of Greenwire

U.S. EPA Administrator Lisa Jackson today vowed to give electric utilities and their state overseers regulatory certainty with a host of forthcoming environmental rules.

Speaking at a conference of state utility regulators today, Jackson outlined a series of pending regulations that will significantly affect utilities, including rules aimed at curbing soot, smog and mercury.

"I believe that we can do it smartly, that we will do it in partnership and that we will do it in a way that gives a clear road map for investors and for regulators and for ratepayers," Jackson said.

EPA will propose a replacement for the Clean Air Interstate Rule in April, Jackson said, to address pollution that crosses state lines.

President George W. Bush's cap-and-trade program was designed to cut sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide in the eastern United States. But CAIR was thrown out by a federal appeals court in 2008. The court temporarily reinstated the rule in December 2008 to give EPA time to craft a replacement. Members of the Senate, meanwhile, are pushing a legislative fix for the CAIR rule (E&ENews PM, Feb. 4).

"Later this year, we'll propose a new utility MACT standard," Jackson added. EPA is facing a court deadline to require plant-specific maximum achievable control technology for mercury and other hazardous air pollutants at power plants by November 2011 (Greenwire, Oct. 23, 2009).

"Working together, we'll set a strong foundation for achieving the reductions that a new MACT and new CAIR rules will require," Jackson said.

Jackson said that although challenges and disagreements will arise during the development of new standards, "the benefits of us getting this right are absolutely unprecedented."

ROCKEFELLER LEADS CHALLENGE TO EPA ON GREENHOUSE GAS REGULATIONS

Sends Letter to EPA Administrator Lisa Jackson - Joined By Other Coal State Senators

Washington, D.C.—Senator John D. (Jay) Rockefeller IV, Chairman of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, lead a group of coal state Senators in sending a letter today to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Lisa Jackson challenging EPA's potential regulation of greenhouse gases (GHGs) from stationary sources under the Clean Air Act.

The letter requests that Administrator Jackson clarify the EPA timetable and suspend EPA regulations for industrial facilities so Congress can consider comprehensive energy and climate legislation. EPA regulation of GHGs from stationary sources has far-reaching implications for the economy as a whole and the energy sector in particular. These affected industrial facilities are significant job generators in coal states, including West Virginia, and can ill-afford ad hoc regulations.

Senator Rockefeller was joined by Senators Begich, Byrd, Sherrod Brown, Casey, McCaskill, Levin, and Baucus in sending the letter, demanding a response to their concerns for the workers and industries affected in their states.

“At a time when so many people are hurting, we need to put the decisions about our energy future in to the hands of the people and their elected representatives—especially on issues impacting clean coal. EPA actions in this area would have enormous implications and these issues need to be handled carefully and appropriately dealt with by the Congress, not in isolation by a federal environmental agency,” said Senator Rockefeller.

Senator Rockefeller is drafting legislation to suspend EPA's regulatory authority to allow sufficient time for Congressional consideration of the nation's larger energy policy and economic needs.

Excerpts from the letter include:

“We remain concerned about the possible impacts on American workers and businesses in a number of industrial sectors, along with the farmers, miners, and small business owners who could be affected as your agency moves beyond automobile emissions standards to implement regulations to curtail GHG pollution from stationary sources.”

“We have a responsibility to the workers and industries in our states to address both your agency's timetable for the implementation of these stationary source regulations, and what you intend the exact requirements for businesses to be.”

“The President and you have been explicit in calling on Congress to pass comprehensive legislation that would enhance our nation's energy and climate security. We strongly believe this is ultimately Congress' responsibility, and if done properly, will create jobs, spur new clean energy industries, and greatly advance the goal of U.S. energy independence. If done improperly, these opportunities could be lost.”

Begich Presses EPA for Explanation of Endangerment Finding, Next Steps
Eight senators outline concerns in letter to Administrator Jackson

U.S. Sen. Mark Begich and West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller have led a group of six other industrial state Democrats in a letter to Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Lisa Jackson, expressing serious economic and energy security concerns about the potential regulation of greenhouse gases (GHGs) under the Clean Air Act. _

The senators write that ill-timed or imprudent regulation of greenhouse gases may squander critical opportunities for the nation, impeding the investment necessary to create jobs and position the nation to develop and produce its own clean energy.

“I’m concerned about the possible negative effects on Alaska businesses as well as on the U.S. economy as a whole, as a result of potential EPA regulation of green house gas pollutants,” Begich said. “I’ve talked with Administrator Jackson about my concerns and we all want to better understand how the process would unfold for regulations to be written and implemented.”

“We need a clear understanding of how you view your agency’s responsibilities and the processes by which you intend to carry them out in order to represent workers, industries, taxpayers, and economic interests of our states,” says the letter signed by Begich, Rockefeller and Senators Sherrod Brown of Ohio, Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, Claire McCaskill of Missouri, Carl Levin of Michigan, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Max Baucus of Montana.

The EPA has proposed to regulate six different GHG pollutants under the Clean Air Act. The agency’s power to do so comes from the “endangerment finding” which resulted from a Supreme Court order. In April 2007, the U.S. Supreme Court in Massachusetts v. EPA ordered that the EPA must scientifically determine whether greenhouse gases (GHGs) from new motor vehicles cause or contribute to air pollution which endangers public health.

Begich and Sen. Jay Rockefeller have shared concerns of the potential impacts on their respective states. They have led the effort among like-minded senators to understand the situation better, thus writing to Administrator Jackson for clarification on several questions.

“We know that businesses need some degree of certainty to operate. And the answers we get back from the EPA will help us and help the business community understand how regulations could affect them,” Begich added.

As President Obama has called on Congress to pass comprehensive legislation to enhance the nation’s energy and climate security, lawmakers signing the letter to Jackson state concern that blunt EPA regulation of emissions will likely not result in the best treatment for Alaska and other states with resource and manufacturing as major components of their economies.

“We strongly believe this is ultimately Congress’ responsibility, and if done properly, will create jobs, spur new clean energy industries, and greatly advance the goal of U.S. energy independence. If done improperly, these opportunities could be lost,” the letter concludes.

Senator Rockefeller is drafting legislation to suspend EPA's regulatory authority to allow sufficient time for Congressional consideration of the nation's larger energy policy and economic needs.

Excerpts from the letter include:

"We remain concerned about the possible impacts on American workers and businesses in a number of industrial sectors, along with the farmers, miners, and small business owners who could be affected as your agency moves beyond automobile emissions standards to implement regulations to curtail GHG pollution from stationary sources."

"We have a responsibility to the workers and industries in our states to address both your agency's timetable for the implementation of these stationary source regulations, and what you intend the exact requirements for businesses to be."

"The President and you have been explicit in calling on Congress to pass comprehensive legislation that would enhance our nation's energy and climate security. We strongly believe this is ultimately Congress' responsibility, and if done properly, will create jobs, spur new clean energy industries, and greatly advance the goal of U.S. energy independence. If done improperly, these opportunities could be lost."

Eight senators outline concerns in letter to Administrator Jackson

U.S. Sen. Mark Begich and West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller have led a group of six other industrial state Democrats in a letter to Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Lisa Jackson, expressing serious economic and energy security concerns about the potential regulation of greenhouse gases (GHGs) under the Clean Air Act. _

The senators write that ill-timed or imprudent regulation of greenhouse gases may squander critical opportunities for the nation, impeding the investment necessary to create jobs and position the nation to develop and produce its own clean energy.

“I’m concerned about the possible negative effects on Alaska businesses as well as on the U.S. economy as a whole, as a result of potential EPA regulation of green house gas pollutants,” Begich said. “I’ve talked with Administrator Jackson about my concerns and we all want to better understand how the process would unfold for regulations to be written and implemented.”

“We need a clear understanding of how you view your agency’s responsibilities and the processes by which you intend to carry them out in order to represent workers, industries, taxpayers, and economic interests of our states,” says the letter signed by Begich, Rockefeller and Senators Sherrod Brown of Ohio, Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, Claire McCaskill of Missouri, Carl Levin of Michigan, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Max Baucus of Montana.

The EPA has proposed to regulate six different GHG pollutants under the Clean Air Act. The agency’s power to do so comes from the “endangerment finding” which resulted from a Supreme Court order. In April 2007, the U.S. Supreme Court in Massachusetts v. EPA ordered that the EPA must scientifically determine whether greenhouse gases (GHGs) from new motor vehicles cause or contribute to air pollution which endangers public health.

Begich and Sen. Jay Rockefeller have shared concerns of the potential impacts on their respective states. They have led the effort among like-minded senators to understand the situation better, thus writing to Administrator Jackson for clarification on several questions.

“We know that businesses need some degree of certainty to operate. And the answers we get back from the EPA will help us and help the business community understand how regulations could affect them,” Begich added.

As President Obama has called on Congress to pass comprehensive legislation to enhance the nation’s energy and climate security, lawmakers signing the letter to Jackson state concern that blunt EPA regulation of emissions will likely not result in the best treatment for Alaska and other states with resource and manufacturing as major components of their economies.

“We strongly believe this is ultimately Congress’ responsibility, and if done properly, will create jobs, spur new clean energy industries, and greatly advance the goal of U.S. energy independence. If done improperly, these opportunities could be lost,” the letter concludes.

ROCKEFELLER LEADS CHALLENGE TO EPA ON GREENHOUSE GAS REGULATIONS

Sends Letter to EPA Administrator Lisa Jackson - Joined By Other Coal State Senators

Washington, D.C.—Senator John D. (Jay) Rockefeller IV, Chairman of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, lead a group of coal state Senators in sending a letter today to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Lisa Jackson challenging EPA's potential regulation of greenhouse gases (GHGs) from stationary sources under the Clean Air Act.

The letter requests that Administrator Jackson clarify the EPA timetable and suspend EPA regulations for industrial facilities so Congress can consider comprehensive energy and climate legislation. EPA regulation of GHGs from stationary sources has far-reaching implications for the economy as a whole and the energy sector in particular. These affected industrial facilities are significant job generators in coal states, including West Virginia, and can ill-afford ad hoc regulations.

Senator Rockefeller was joined by Senators Begich, Byrd, Sherrod Brown, Casey, McCaskill, Levin, and Baucus in sending the letter, demanding a response to their concerns for the workers and industries affected in their states.

“At a time when so many people are hurting, we need to put the decisions about our energy future in to the hands of the people and their elected representatives—especially on issues impacting clean coal. EPA actions in this area would have enormous implications and these issues need to be handled carefully and appropriately dealt with by the Congress, not in isolation by a federal environmental agency,” said Senator Rockefeller.

Senator Rockefeller is drafting legislation to suspend EPA's regulatory authority to allow sufficient time for Congressional consideration of the nation's larger energy policy and economic needs.

Excerpts from the letter include:

"We remain concerned about the possible impacts on American workers and businesses in a number of industrial sectors, along with the farmers, miners, and small business owners who could be affected as your agency moves beyond automobile emissions standards to implement regulations to curtail GHG pollution from stationary sources."

The EPA has proposed to regulate six different GHG pollutants under the Clean Air Act. The agency's power to do so comes from the "endangerment finding" which resulted from a Supreme Court order. In April 2007, the U.S. Supreme Court in Massachusetts v. EPA ordered that the EPA must scientifically determine whether greenhouse gases (GHGs) from new motor vehicles cause or contribute to air pollution which endangers public health.

Begich and Sen. Jay Rockefeller have shared concerns of the potential impacts on their respective states. They have led the effort among like-minded senators to understand the situation better, thus writing to Administrator Jackson for clarification on several questions.

"We know that businesses need some degree of certainty to operate. And the answers we get back from the EPA will help us and help the business community understand how regulations could affect them," Begich added.

As President Obama has called on Congress to pass comprehensive legislation to enhance the nation's energy and climate security, lawmakers signing the letter to Jackson state concern that blunt EPA regulation of emissions will likely not result in the best treatment for Alaska and other states with resource and manufacturing as major components of their economies.

"We strongly believe this is ultimately Congress' responsibility, and if done properly, will create jobs, spur new clean energy industries, and greatly advance the goal of U.S. energy independence. If done improperly, these opportunities could be lost," the letter concludes.

ROCKEFELLER LEADS CHALLENGE TO EPA ON GREENHOUSE GAS REGULATIONS

Sends Letter to EPA Administrator Lisa Jackson - Joined By Other Coal State Senators

Washington, D.C.—Senator John D. (Jay) Rockefeller IV, Chairman of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, lead a group of coal state Senators in sending a letter today to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Lisa Jackson challenging EPA's potential regulation of greenhouse gases (GHGs) from stationary sources under the Clean Air Act.

The letter requests that Administrator Jackson clarify the EPA timetable and suspend EPA regulations for industrial facilities so Congress can consider comprehensive energy and climate legislation. EPA regulation of GHGs from stationary sources has far-reaching implications for the economy as a whole and the energy sector in particular. These affected industrial facilities are significant job generators in coal states, including West Virginia, and can ill-afford ad hoc regulations.

Senator Rockefeller was joined by Senators Begich, Byrd, Sherrod Brown, Casey, McCaskill, Levin, and Baucus in sending the letter, demanding a response to their concerns for the workers and industries affected in their states.

“At a time when so many people are hurting, we need to put the decisions about our energy future in to the hands of the people and their elected representatives—especially on issues impacting clean coal. EPA actions in this area would have enormous implications and these issues need to be handled carefully and appropriately dealt with by the Congress, not in isolation by a federal environmental agency,” said Senator Rockefeller.

Senator Rockefeller is drafting legislation to suspend EPA's regulatory authority to allow sufficient time for Congressional consideration of the nation's larger energy policy and economic needs.

Excerpts from the letter include:

“We remain concerned about the possible impacts on American workers and businesses in a number of industrial sectors, along with the farmers, miners, and small business owners who could be affected as your agency moves beyond automobile emissions standards to implement regulations to curtail GHG pollution from stationary sources.”

“We have a responsibility to the workers and industries in our states to address both your agency's timetable for the implementation of these stationary source regulations, and what you intend the exact requirements for businesses to be.”

“The President and you have been explicit in calling on Congress to pass comprehensive legislation that would enhance our nation's energy and climate security. We strongly believe this is ultimately Congress' responsibility, and if done properly, will create jobs, spur new clean energy industries, and greatly advance the goal of U.S. energy independence. If done improperly, these opportunities could be lost.”

Begich Presses EPA for Explanation of Endangerment Finding, Next Steps
Eight senators outline concerns in letter to Administrator Jackson

U.S. Sen. Mark Begich and West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller have led a group of six other industrial state Democrats in a letter to Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Lisa Jackson, expressing serious economic and energy security concerns about the potential regulation of greenhouse gases (GHGs) under the Clean Air Act. _

The senators write that ill-timed or imprudent regulation of greenhouse gases may squander critical opportunities for the nation, impeding the investment necessary to create jobs and position the nation to develop and produce its own clean energy.

“I’m concerned about the possible negative effects on Alaska businesses as well as on the U.S. economy as a whole, as a result of potential EPA regulation of green house gas pollutants,” Begich said. “I’ve talked with Administrator Jackson about my concerns and we all want to better understand how the process would unfold for regulations to be written and implemented.”

“We need a clear understanding of how you view your agency’s responsibilities and the processes by which you intend to carry them out in order to represent workers, industries, taxpayers, and economic interests of our states,” says the letter signed by Begich, Rockefeller and Senators Sherrod Brown of Ohio, Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, Claire McCaskill of Missouri, Carl Levin of Michigan, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Max Baucus of Montana.

The EPA has proposed to regulate six different GHG pollutants under the Clean Air Act. The agency’s power to do so comes from the “endangerment finding” which resulted from a Supreme Court order. In April 2007, the U.S. Supreme Court in *Massachusetts v. “We know that businesses need some degree of certainty to operate. And the answers we get back from the EPA will help us and help the business community understand how regulations could affect them,” Begich added.

As President Obama has called on Congress to pass comprehensive legislation to enhance the nation’s energy and climate security, lawmakers signing the letter to Jackson state concern that blunt EPA regulation of emissions will likely not result in the best treatment for Alaska and other states with resource and manufacturing as major components of their economies.

“We strongly believe this is ultimately Congress’ responsibility, and if done properly, will create jobs, spur new clean energy industries, and greatly advance the goal of U.S. energy independence. If done improperly, these opportunities could be lost,” the letter concludes.

CLIMATE: EPA's gradual phase in of GHG regs garners qualified praise from senators (Tuesday, February 23, 2010)

Robin Bravender and Darren Samuelsohn, E&E reporters

Facing mounting pressure from congressional lawmakers on both sides of the aisle, the Obama administration yesterday vowed to gradually phase in climate regulations for industrial sources.

U.S. EPA Administrator Lisa Jackson said that no stationary sources will face greenhouse gas regulations this year and that small sources will not be subject to permitting requirements any sooner than 2016. EPA is also considering "substantially" raising the thresholds in its proposed "tailoring" rule to exempt more facilities from requirements that they minimize their greenhouse gas emissions.

The announcement is seen as a step forward by both Republican and Democratic lawmakers who have expressed concerns about the possible economic consequences of regulating carbon dioxide and other gases, but several senators said they still plan to move forward with efforts to handcuff EPA's regulatory authority.

Jackson's comments came in response to a letter sent last week by eight moderate Senate Democrats pressing for answers on how and when EPA plans to begin regulating the heat-trapping gases, warning that the costs may be too much for their states.

"I share your goals of ensuring economic recovery at this critical time and of addressing greenhouse-gas emissions in sensible ways that are consistent with the call for comprehensive energy and climate legislation," Jackson wrote.

EPA will begin to phase in permitting requirements and regulating large stationary sources of greenhouse gases in 2011, Jackson said. In early 2011, only facilities that must already apply for Clean Air Act permits for other pollutants will need to address those emissions. Fewer than 400 facilities would be subject to those requirements, she said. The agency will begin to require permits from other large sources in the latter half of 2011.

Senators who are backing efforts to hamstring EPA's regulatory authority said the gradual schedule was a positive signal.

"It helps," said Commerce Chairman Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.), who was one of the lead signatories on the letter sent last week to EPA.

Still, Rockefeller said that EPA regulations would have enormous implications on coal state economies and should be handled by Congress instead of a federal agency. Rockefeller said he remains committed to "presenting legislation that would provide Congress the space it needs to craft a workable policy that will protect jobs and stimulate the economy."

Rockefeller has said he plans to introduce a bill that would halt EPA's rules for between two and five years.

"I can't say this with total authority, but I think that to some extent Lisa [Jackson] and to more extent the White House wants this," Rockefeller said of his bill. "We probably ask for more time than they want," he added, but when drafting the bill, "we talked as we went along with the EPA and the White House."

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who is pushing a separate resolution aimed at blocking EPA climate rules, also welcomed EPA's announcement.

Murkowski aides read the EPA letter for the first time just off the Senate floor. "It's a pretty substantial backing off," one staffer said, referring to Jackson's plan to delay until 2011 any climate-related stationary permits.

"Well, considering where we were yesterday, absolutely," Murkowski added. "Absolutely."

Murkowski, the ranking member of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said EPA's planned schedule was "good" but said she had a number of questions as well.

"One of the unknowns is, if they're in agreement they're not going to be moving on stationary, that's certainly helpful, but what happens to permits in the meantime?" Murkowski said. "Will any permits be issued? Are they just kind of put on hold? I suppose you can expect to see litigation against EPA failing then to move on the stationary sources? What does that do to the permits then to move on the stationary sources?

"What we're trying to do is gain a little certainty here," she added. "I'd be curious to know whether they actually believe we'll have more certainty or less."

Late yesterday, Murkowski said her resolution remains the best path because it uses the Congressional Review Act -- which requires 51 votes to pass the Senate -- to block EPA, rather than Rockefeller's bill, which would require 60 votes to pass and for a shorter timer period.

"A temporary timeout isn't sufficient," said Murkowski spokesman Robert Dillon. "Bad regulations today are bad regulations tomorrow."

Sen. Mark Begich (D-Alaska), who also signed on to the letter questioning EPA's regulatory plans, said the calendar laid out by Jackson "makes me feel a lot more comfortable." Begich noted that he had not yet read EPA's response.

States laud timeline

State and local air regulators also applauded EPA's plans to gradually roll out the permitting requirements.

"We are extremely pleased that EPA is providing states with the additional time and flexibility outlined in Administrator Jackson's letter," said Bill Becker, executive director of the National Association of Clean Air Agencies. "It will result in a much smoother transition and allow states to tailor their rules to comport to the federal regulations in a seamless manner."

EPA's proposed tailoring rule would have raised emission thresholds for facilities that need permits from 100 or 250 tons of pollution per year -- the Clean Air Act's thresholds for conventional pollutants -- to 25,000 tons of carbon dioxide equivalent per year.

Jackson said yesterday that EPA's final tailoring rule -- expected next month -- will include a "substantially higher" threshold than the proposal.

But while the draft rule seeks to raise the permitting thresholds across the country, state regulators and some industry groups have warned that states will need additional time to change lower thresholds that they have on the books.

Nearly 40 states operate under EPA-approved "State Implementation Plans" (SIPs) that establish a 100- or 250-ton threshold for the permitting requirements, according to an association of state and local air regulators. Those state limits would remain in place until state laws and regulations are modified, the group said.

Rockefeller has said he plans to introduce a bill that would halt EPA's rules for between two and five years.

"I can't say this with total authority, but I think that to some extent Lisa [Jackson] and to more extent the White House wants this," Rockefeller said of his bill. "We probably ask for more time than they want," he added, but when drafting the bill, "we talked as we went along with the EPA and the White House."

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who is pushing a separate resolution aimed at blocking EPA climate rules, also welcomed EPA's announcement.

Murkowski aides read the EPA letter for the first time just off the Senate floor. "It's a pretty substantial backing off," one staffer said, referring to Jackson's plan to delay until 2011 any climate-related stationary permits.

"Well, considering where we were yesterday, absolutely," Murkowski added. "Absolutely."

Murkowski, the ranking member of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said EPA's planned schedule was "good" but said she had a number of questions as well.

"One of the unknowns is, if they're in agreement they're not going to be moving on stationary, that's certainly helpful, but what happens to permits in the meantime?" Murkowski said. "Will any permits be issued? Are they just kind of put on hold? I suppose you can expect to see litigation against EPA failing then to move on the stationary sources? What does that do to the permits then to move on the stationary sources?"

"What we're trying to do is gain a little certainty here," she added. "I'd be curious to know whether they actually believe we'll have more certainty or less."

Late yesterday, Murkowski said her resolution remains the best path because it uses the Congressional Review Act -- which requires 51 votes to pass the Senate -- to block EPA, rather than Rockefeller's bill, which would require 60 votes to pass and for a shorter timer period.

"A temporary timeout isn't sufficient," said Murkowski spokesman Robert Dillon. "Bad regulations today are bad regulations tomorrow."

Sen. Mark Begich (D-Alaska), who also signed on to the letter questioning EPA's regulatory plans, said the calendar laid out by Jackson "makes me feel a lot more comfortable." Begich noted that he had not yet read EPA's response.

States laud timeline

State and local air regulators also applauded EPA's plans to gradually roll out the permitting requirements.

"We are extremely pleased that EPA is providing states with the additional time and flexibility outlined in Administrator Jackson's letter," said Bill Becker, executive director of the National Association of Clean Air Agencies. "It will result in a much smoother transition and allow states to tailor their rules to comport to the federal regulations in a seamless manner."

EPA's proposed tailoring rule would have raised emission thresholds for facilities that need permits from 100 or 250 tons of pollution per year -- the Clean Air Act's thresholds for conventional pollutants -- to 25,000 tons of carbon dioxide equivalent per year.

Jackson said yesterday that EPA's final tailoring rule -- expected next month -- will include a "substantially higher" threshold than the proposal.

But while the draft rule seeks to raise the permitting thresholds across the country, state regulators and some industry groups have warned that states will need additional time to change lower thresholds that they have on the books.

Nearly 40 states operate under EPA-approved "State Implementation Plans" (SIPs) that establish a 100- or 250-ton threshold for the permitting requirements, according to an association of state and local air regulators. Those state limits would remain in place until state laws and regulations are modified, the group said.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ROBERT C. BYRD, D-W.Va.
March 4, 2010

"I do not plan to cosponsor Senator Rockefeller's legislation at this time. I was encouraged by the response last week from EPA Administrator Lisa Jackson to a letter that I signed along with other Senators that would delay into next year the application of stronger standards regarding increased efficiency or reduced pollution at large power plants and factories. Following up on my previous conversations with her in my office, I take her at her word."

"In addition, as I have pointed out in my op-ed of December 3, 2009 entitled 'Coal Must Embrace the Future,' West Virginia needs to have a seat at the negotiating table. I am continuing to have significant discussions about how to ensure the future of coal as a long-term energy resource. I am reluctant to give up on talks that might produce benefits for West Virginia's coal interests by seeming to turn away from on-going negotiations. I will continue to negotiate with all who are earnestly engaged in the pursuit of a proper balance between saving jobs, protecting the environment and ensuring the health of our communities."
